chief/chairman of Tanana Chiefs Conference, in a prepared written statement.

“The government allows the commercial industry to carry on unchanged, while the people who have responsibly cared for our precious natural resources for centuries are harmed,” he said.

In the complaint, the Association of Village Council Presidents says, “Salmon is the main fish that families rely on to feed them through the winter. It is foundational to the cultures and ways of life of citizens of AVCP’s member tribes.”

Restrictions on subsistence fishing mean that fish isn’t available, and without summer trips to fish camps, traditional customs and languages aren’t taught as frequently, the complaint states.

While salmon is critical for the region, many Western Alaska villages participate in the allowable annual groundfish catch through the federal government’s Community Development Quota program, and restrictions on groundfish would affect the CDQ groups’ earnings.

Joy Andersen, general counsel for the association, said the association’s participation was authorized by its executive board. By phone, she deferred questions about the possible effect on CDQ groups and said the lawsuit is only one aspect of the association’s approach to dealing with the ongoing salmon crisis.

“This is one of many avenues

we’re looking to address,” she said.

Fund Dividend without compromising high-quality state services,” he said in the statement.

In 2019, Gov. Mike Dunleavy’s budget proposal would have shifted $420 million in oil property tax revenue from local governments to the state; the North Slope Borough would have shouldered much of the burden. The proposal never advanced in the Legislature and Dunleavy hasn’t repeated the proposal since then. Groh’s bill would leave the existing oil property taxes in the hands of local governments, with only the new revenue going to the state.

Groh’s proposal joins other revenue bills, including a proposed state sales tax and proposed reductions in tax exemptions for North Slope oil and gas firms.
