Saint Michael
False Report: On July 31, 2025, Alaska State Troopers assisted the Nome District Attorney's Office in contacting Saint Michael Village Police Officer Joseph Galindo to prepare for an upcoming trial involving Thomas Lockwood where he was the primary witness. Galindo made inconsistent and illogical statements during the call and an investigation revealed he fabricated the incident at the center of the trial. The charges against Lockwood were subsequently dismissed and Galindo was arrested on charges of official misconduct, hindering prosecution, reckless endangerment and false reporting.

•U.S. Coast Guard adds icebreaker

feet while still moving forward, Baxa said.

After Shell discontinued its Alaska offshore drilling, Edison Chouest lobbied members of Congress and urged lawmakers to purchase the Aiviq for use by the federal government.

The Coast Guard initially resisted. In a 2016 hearing of the U.S. House’s Coast Guard and Maritime Transportation Subcommittee, then-Coast Guard Vice Commandant Charles Michel told lawmakers that “our current opinion is that the ship is not suitable for military service, without substantial refit.”

Then-Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, called Michel’s statement a “bullst answer” because the Aiviq would be asked to move ice, not perform military duties.

In 2022, after Young’s death in office, Congress passed the Don Young Coast Guard Authorization Act, which approved funding for the Coast Guard to buy a “United States built available icebreaker.”

The Coast Guard, which had been considering a Finland-built ship, switched to the Aiviq as the only available ship that met Congress’ qualifications.

Subsequent reporting by ProPublica showed an extensive history of political donations by Edison Chouest to members of Congress, including Alaska’s delegation.

“It is ready for Coast Guard service,” Lunday said of the Aiviq-turned-Storis when asked about the July 2016 hearing that labeled the Aiviq as unfit.

“We’ve learned a lot since then, and we’ve had great support from Congress to have the appropriations necessary last year to purchase the ship,” he said.

Sullivan, among the members of Congress who received contributions from Edison Chouest, denied that those donations contributed to the decision to purchase the Aiviq.

“It has nothing to do with it,” Sullivan said. “Zero. I’ve been pressing for more icebreakers any way possible for our country ... and the Coast Guard was looking at the idea of a commercially available one.”

New ship carries relics of prior history

The new Storis is named after its predecessor, an icebreaker that was commissioned in 1942 and served until 2007, becoming the oldest commissioned Coast Guard cutter in the fleet at the time of its decommissioning and scrapping.

In 1957, it and several other ships sailed through the Northwest Passage, marking the first time an American ship had taken that route.

Thirty-two years after that historic voyage, the Storis assisted with the cleanup after the Exxon Valdez oil spill. Ed Sasser was a crewman on board at the time. On Saturday, he sailed aboard the new edition of his former ship.

“It’s pretty cushy compared to the old Storis,” he said, noting that both ships were and are unique vessels, not part of a larger class of ships.

If he were young again, he’d serve aboard the new ship “in a New York minute.”

“Time will tell how useful it is,” he said.

Remnants of the ship’s former life remain obvious throughout.

Belowdecks are large steel containers, intended to haul bulk dry concrete or other material to offshore oil fields. For now, they’re empty until the Coast Guard either removes them or finds a use for them.

Other pieces of the Storis’ original purpose could be useful to its new mission. Its stern holds heavy-duty towing gear, and large firefighting cannons jut from its superstructure.

The ship has no internal laboratory space, as does the Coast Guard’s other medium icebreaker, the Healy, but it does have deck attachments for container modules that could allow it to accommodate labs.

Already, one of those spaces was in use Sunday, holding the ship’s brand-new armory, including four .50-caliber machine guns.

“I’ve made this joke for many, many years ... it’s that if you can imagine it, and you can put it into a standard 20-foot IMO container, I can embark it on board. ... we had on board a very, very senior Marine Corps officer, and he asked, ‘hey, what if I put a Marine Raider team in a box?’ I said, ‘Yes, sir, I can embark that on board.’ It really does provide that flexibility for missions,” Baxa said.

The Coast Guard’s staffing contract with Edison Chouest is scheduled to run through November, and it could be extended for one year.

Both Baxa and the ship’s captain said they’ll be recommending that extension.

Lt. Cmdr. George Greendyk, the engineer officer on board the Storis, said he hasn’t had problems with the Edison Chouest civilian crew.

“Everywhere we go, we have people that have seen something like this before, and they’ve been certainly helpful answering questions for us and guiding us as we run the engineering plant,” he said.

“Right now, our primary mission
